THE RISING TIDE OF DEMENTIA IN CANADA: FACING THE CRITICAL CHALLENGE BY 2025

Objectives:

- To present the current science and landscape on the impact of dementia
- To explore prevention, care models and innovation strategies
- To develop the foundation for a CAHS major assessment to address the projected impact of dementia and potential solutions by 2025

Our Canadian society, along with other developed and populous developing countries, is facing an unprecedented demographic shift to populations over age 65. This shift is projected to bring with it a rising tide of dementia in the coming decades. This will reshape our landscape, socially, economically, medically and politically. It will tax our delivery of care, our environment, and the sustainability of our current health care system. In turn, we can anticipate enormous social, economic, medical and political challenges. This raises a call to our scientific community to mobilize on numerous fronts to identify critical gaps and potential opportunities to innovate, given the lead time available.

While much hope is pinned on finding an effective treatment for Alzheimer's disease by 2020-2025 as a major anchor piece of the public agenda, there are many other approaches that will need to be supported and developed to address the challenge: prevention, adaptation of systems of care, and innovative practices and technologies.

The prevention of dementia, through modification of risk factors, holds the potential to remarkably reduce disease prevalence. Estimates are that if dementia could be delayed by five years over the next three decades, through effective intervention, the prevalence would be reduced by 50%.¹ An increased emphasis on the public health aspect of this disorder, with focus on successful brain health promotion and modification of risk factors in mid-life, is needed as are strategies to promote quality of life for those affected and education and awareness for them and their families. Our systems of care will need to adapt, both at the community and institutional level, addressing the workforce, delivery systems, long standing quality of care issues and integration of efforts that will be needed. Rapidly evolving innovative technologies, including robotics, driverless cars, sensors and built environments, all hold the potential to help address unmet needs though require significant development, testing, and investment to support their advancement to point of care.

We look forward to this symposium which will bring together a wide range of the different strategies that need to be put in place over the next decade to address the challenge. A major focus will be to engage the audience in helping set the groundwork for an assessment by the CAHS.

Thank you for participating in the 2015 CAHS Forum.

Sincerely,

CAROLE ESTABROOKS AND HOWARD FELDMAN

Ontario has more brain scientists than almost any jurisdiction in the world. Our task at the Ontario Brain Institute is to draw those researchers together into seamless, convergent partnerships with clinicians, industry, patients and their advocates. The goal: to facilitate the kind of continual interaction and discovery among these players that delivers innovative services and products for brain-related health care.

The Institute is a government-funded, not-for-profit initiative whose scope spans the entire continuum of brain science and treatment. As a virtual research centre, we have no labs and conduct no research of our own. Instead, our projects and programs are focused on bringing actors and elements together and enabling their interaction.
